ALONG SHORE, August, 1873 .- This time it happened at Stony Creek, Conn. The sun was setting benind an auburn cow. I was sitting, too; sitting upon the plazza of Frink's Indian Point House, watching a blonde caterpillar crawling across a brunette lady's neck. I was wondering what in the world that caterpillar's mother let it wear its winter furs for in such warm weather, and I thought possibly it might be because it was fur from home. Everything was as silent as a dead clam.

There is lots of fun at Story Creek, only a fellow is table to get so lazy he has to be turned over on the gross with a handspike.

Sam W. from Pitsfield, Mass, and Frank W. from Sprincheld, in the same State, were there. These fellows got an idea that drinking sait water was good for their health, and they would get up mornins and drink all they could. At last these doines attracted attention. The period over the boats wouldn't then the boats wouldn't the attention. The period of the Panic exiled an indignation meeting the counted me at the total and they indicated an indignation meeting the counted me at the table.

Next to me sat a man. His figure looked as if he might have spent his life stooping over to inspect coal holes or picking up pins. He was just the shape of a comma, and if he'd fallen on his back he'd been a cradle rocker, and on his face he'd been a good croquet wicket. Suddenly an intellectual spasm passed through his frame. I guess he struck his funny bone, for he spoke. His voice—well, did you ever see a Dutchman knock a long brass faucet into a lager beer keg, how after he gets it partly in, he stops, and, raising the mallet aioft, he gives it one devil of a rap that sends the faucet into the keg way up to its knees?—If you have seen this, and have listened to the hiss of the lager as that faucet goes home, then you know just what that man's voice was like.
